The Great Chicago Fire of 1871 was one of the most devastating fires in American history. It destroyed over 17,000 buildings and left more than 100,000 people homeless. In the aftermath of the fire, a group of citizens came together to create a series of scrapbooks filled with newspaper clippings, photographs, and other memorabilia related to the event. These scrapbooks are now housed at the Chicago History Museum and provide a fascinating glimpse into the city's darkest hour.

The scrapbooks were created by a group of women who were members of the Ladies' Relief Society. The society was formed in the aftermath of the fire to provide aid to the victims. The women collected newspaper clippings, photographs, and other items that documented the fire and its aftermath. They also interviewed survivors and recorded their stories.

The scrapbooks are a valuable historical resource. They provide a first-hand account of the fire and its impact on the city. They also offer a glimpse into the lives of the people who lived through the disaster.

One of the most interesting things about the scrapbooks is the variety of materials they contain. In addition to newspaper clippings and photographs, the scrapbooks also include letters, diaries, and other personal items. This diversity of materials provides a rich and textured account of the fire.

The scrapbooks are also a reminder of the resilience of the people of Chicago. In the aftermath of the fire, the city was devastated. But the people of Chicago came together to rebuild their city. The scrapbooks are a testament to their strength and determination.
