Recorded at Sonic Ranch in Tornillo, Texas, amidst the vast expanses of the desert landscape, "We Sing New Language" bears the influence of its desolate surroundings. Moore masterfully weaves together guitar feedback, ambient soundscapes, and unconventional arrangements, creating a mesmerizing and enigmatic sonic tapestry.

Deconstructing and Rebuilding: A Tapestry of Guitar Innovation

At the heart of "We Sing New Language" lies Moore's innovative approach to guitar playing. He transforms his instrument into a conduit for sonic experimentation, utilizing feedback as a creative force and manipulating it through a myriad of effects pedals.

Each track unfolds as an intricate sonic landscape, where distorted guitar riffs meld seamlessly with ethereal melodies and abstract sounds. Moore's virtuosic technique defies categorization, blurring the boundaries between traditional guitar sounds and avant-garde exploration.

Unconventional Collaborations: Expanding Sonic Horizons

Moore is not content with merely pushing the boundaries of guitar playing. He extends his musical reach through collaborations with a diverse array of artists, further expanding the sonic palette of "We Sing New Language."

Cellist Samara Lubelski lends her ethereal and haunting melodies to the album, while guitarist James Sedwards contributes atmospheric soundscapes and intricate counterpoint. The inclusion of spoken word poetry by Radieux Radio further enhances the album's evocative and introspective nature.

Thematic Explorations: Language and Communication

Beyond its musical intricacies, "We Sing New Language" delves into profound thematic explorations. Moore's lyrics and spoken word passages grapple with the complexities of language and communication, questioning its ability to convey the ineffable and bridge the gaps between individuals.

The title track evokes the idea of breaking free from linguistic constraints and forging new ways of expression. Moore sings, "We sing new language / Beyond categories / Beyond the old limit," suggesting the need to move beyond conventional modes of communication to find deeper connections.

A Sonic Pilgrimage: From Isolation to Transcendence

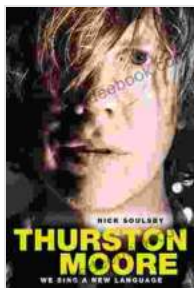

The sonic journey of "We Sing New Language" mirrors a pilgrimage, a quest for transcendence through the exploration of sound. Moore's compositions traverse a vast sonic landscape, from moments of isolation and introspection to bursts of exhilarating energy.

The album's final track, "February," serves as a poignant culmination of this journey. Beginning with a solitary guitar melody, it gradually builds into a crescendo of distorted feedback and ethereal vocals, leaving listeners with a sense of unresolved longing and the possibility of future sonic exploration.

: A Landmark in Experimental Music

Thurston Moore's "We Sing New Language" stands as a landmark achievement in experimental music, a bold and uncompromising exploration of sonic possibilities. Through his innovative guitar playing, unconventional collaborations, and profound thematic explorations, Moore invites listeners to embark on a journey of self-discovery and sonic transformation.

This album is not merely a collection of songs but a living, breathing entity that defies easy categorization. It is a testament to Moore's enduring passion for pushing the boundaries of music and his unwavering belief in the power of sound to transcend traditional limits.
